

Tips for Work-Life Coordinators and Supervisors

Meaningful Conversation Starters

Supervisors should strive to maintain an employee-focused mindset when considering challenges employees may be facing as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic. Supervisors should work to understand employee needs and offer workplace flexibilities when possible. The following open-ended questions can help guide a conversation that can result in meaningful information:

- What are you most concerned about?
 Supervisors can begin the conversation by allowing employees to guide the discussion and focus on topics most important to them.
- What workplace support do you value most for assisting you as we progress towards resuming a normal work schedule?
 Supervisors are encouraged to share resources available through EAP to demonstrate the possible program supports and manage expectations.
- What are your expectations from me and the organization?
 A clear understanding of what employees need and expect can assist supervisors in holding productive and transparent conversations with staff.
- How can I help you move forward?
 Understanding the common goal of assisting staff in phasing back to the office environment with minimal stress allows supervisors to ask what the employee needs and make that transition successful.
- When should we check-in again?
 Supervisors can offer regular and continued support as employees learn to manage their responsibilities.

more information

Contact your local HR office to find your agency's EAP Administrator
or search OPM's
Work-Life Contact Tool available at:
opm.gov/CCLContact

Additional

is available at opm.gov/worklife

information

